

Auditor

Audit Division staff use their broad-ranging expertise to conduct sophisticated program reviews, examinations of grant programs and contracts, financial or finance-related audits, and assessments of information technology security of Department of Justice components and activities. Through their work, OIG Auditors gain a thorough understanding of the Department of Justice and effect positive change in the important operations and programs of the Department.

Given the size and diversity of the Department's domestic and international operations, potential assignments for OIG Auditors are wide-ranging. Auditors may find themselves reviewing classified FBI counterterrorism programs, assessing DEA overseas operations, auditing ATF financial practices, evaluating the security and reliability of a critical information system, or assessing a company's performance of a multi-million dollar contract with the Department of Justice.

Employee Insight: Natasha Torres

"Prior to becoming part of the OIG, I worked at a CPA firm in Puerto Rico as an Auditor. I enjoyed the work, but wanted to do something different. When I learned about the OIG, I thought it was a great fit. I joined the OIG's Atlanta Regional Audit Office in 2010.

I have been provided with opportunities and experiences from the moment I joined the OIG, which has helped me move up from GS-7 to GS-13. One great example is that I was able to participate in the Leadership Development Program in 2015. The program provides training in leadership and management. It is a great opportunity to grow personally and professionally. About a week before I was selected for the program, I found out I was pregnant. I thought my pregnancy would inhibit my ability to participate, but the OIG was able to work around my schedule to accommodate me so I could take advantage of the program. I am very fortunate to work at the OIG, and to have been provided so many opportunities. The OIG feels like a second home. I am proud to be here."
